So he was appalled that the state was using $3,500 to investigate the case of a teenage boy who was raped by four older men when he was only 13 or 14 years old, and the victim was knocked unconscious. "That's nuts. I'm certainly not going to spend $3,500 to investigate that. There's no need for it. He told them that they need to investigate a pattern of abuse against him by four men, when he was only 13 or 14 years old. I was really shocked that they were going to devote so much time and effort to that. "If we had just thrown [the money] out the window then we'd have to find $3,500, but I think we're within reason and we can get this thing done, but we've gotta have a whole lot of community support. That's what the other side is counting on." The Cisneros family are counting on the help of the community, he said, because doing this alone is going to take "a tremendous amount of resources." "We have limited resources. We can only do this for so long. A lot of victims get the same thing, so I'd be willing to help as many people as I can, but we need the community to help and support us. Because you have these big fights that happen in our society. "Sometimes people get really mad and they get angry at the country in 2016. Two other Canadians also died as a result of being struck by lightning, but the cause of death is not yet known. One death occurred in Southeast Alaska, the other in British Columbia. While most people are struck by lightning several times in their lives, it is extremely rare for a person to die from the electrical strike, according to the Canadian Institutes of Health Research. In Canadian provinces, the average is one lightning-related fatality
