Description: The company that founded the Myriad 2 had already announced the first development kit for its parallel processing, a much-hyped development that might give its creators and users the means to cut down prices and time of Intel and

AMD CPUs, which are getting more and more expensive. The technology will allow developers to create their own CPUs on a single chip, essentially letting it work with clusters of processors to achieve processing speed up to 4.2 GHz. While these devices will be way too expensive, Intel is also keeping an eye on them. The company might release its own line of dual-core ULV processors before the end of 2013, and is considering even tri-core models for 2014. It's said that the Myriad 2 might be ready for production in early 2013, while the first development kit with support for AMD CPUs will come this November. Let's take a look at the tech specs. Description: Up to 4.2 GHz processor speed Dual-core, quad-thread CPU with 512 KB L2 cache and 2 MB L3 cache Memory interface:
