I am having real problems finding anything that tells you how to get this game to work. Two of Central Bank's top officials are lobbying Brussels and Washington to change the mandate of the European Banking Authority. In particular, they want to bar the ECB from assessing the stability risk and solvency of banks. But their plan has put them in the midst of a political brawl between European Union capitals who want to keep the EBA as an independent institution while the US wants it merged into its own Financial Stability Oversight Council. Voting goes on Friday (January 18), with the outcome likely to be announced in the next few days. "We are pushing for a reform where banks are not subject to the ECB's resolution function," said two top officials who insisted on anonymity. "The EBA is already working and it would be crazy to have a parallel assessment that is not fully informed by the actions of the banking system. We cannot have a system where the EU will punish national banks that are inside the red but will reward the ones that are not in trouble." Another official said: "We have a political objective with this. The EBA's mandate doesn't really need to be changed. But the EBA is almost too independent. It is not doing enough. It is not standing up for weaker banks." The two officials said they were pushing for a binding regime in line with the principles set by the Single Resolution Board in the US, where policy makers are required to use policy tools in proportion to the risk posed to the financial system and are held to account for their decisions. This is something the EBA should also follow, they said. The ECB already has resolution powers over a number of European banks under its ownership. But as it has no obligation to absorb those 570a42141b
