The Los Angeles Rams spent the off-season of 2018 working to become an elite defensive team. Now that season is over, we can take a look back at who they are, how they fared, and how they could use another offseason worth of work. The silver lining of the Los Angeles Rams' season was that their off-season work was worth it. Not only did the Rams win their first playoff game in Los Angeles, but one of their top offseason moves was the acquisition of defensive tackle Ndamukong Suh. The Rams are a largely underrated defensive team, and it's that underrated strength that allowed them to improve with the additions of Suh and Marcus Peters, both of whom were signed as free agents last year. Before the season, we got a peek into the team that the Rams had developed, and we learned who was making plays on the defensive side of the ball. The real thing we wanted to see, however, was how they would fare against the pass. In 2018, Los Angeles allowed 518 passing plays of 20-plus yards. That number ranked 22nd in the league, and if the team could keep up that pace, they'd be doing good things, especially in light of this week's shocking announcement. So, with 2018 over, and 2019 a new season to look forward to, here's a look at the 2018 season and off-season as we know it, and what it means for the Rams as they look towards 2019. 2018 season As a whole, the Los Angeles Rams' 2018 season was respectable. They went 12-6, tied for second in the NFC West and made the playoffs. However, that said, this team still left a lot to be desired. Los Angeles had struggles in the red zone, as well as some other areas of the field. Their passing game was quiet, and their best receivers often disappeared in games. In 2018, Los Angeles was the 11th best team in the NFL. They allowed 30.9 points per game, 5.1 more points than the league average. Their 445.1 yards allowed per game were also 1.6 more than the league average. They only allowed 68.6 percent completions, which was the 10th best mark in the league. However, they allowed 11.5 percent of their passing plays to reach 20-plus yards, which was the fourth worst number in the NFL. In the front seven, the
