Influence of the molecular conformation of chiral amino acid analogues on their permeation across the blood-brain barrier in situ. A series of chiral amino acid analogues is known to exhibit high selectivity as an inhibitor of the L-amino acid transporter in the brain. In this study, the influence of the molecular conformation of chiral L-2-amino-3-phenylpropanoic acid (L-APA) analogues on their transport across the blood-brain barrier (BBB) was investigated. The L-APA analogue having the beta-methylene-gamma-lactone structure was taken as a good model of the inhibitors. The permeation across the BBB was quantitated by the depletion of the analyte in the brain from the dialysate after an i.v. injection of the analyte into the mother animal. The transcellular transport was also investigated by monitoring the accumulation of the analyte in the brain. The chiral derivatives were excellent substrate of the transporters in both cases. Furthermore, introduction of the chiral group increased the permeation across the BBB, and the enantioselectivity of the transporters was strongly reflected in the permeation. Among the chiral derivatives studied, the epimeric pair of L-APA-beta-E and L-APA-beta-Z were effective L-amino acid transporter inhibitors and enantiomers of L-APA without enantioselectivity. The results suggested that the characteristics of the two inhibitors, epimeric pair of L-APA-beta-E and L-APA-beta-Z, as a transmembrane transport, were analogous to the inhibitors with planar ring structure of L-APA analogues and that the characteristic of the epimeric pair, i.e., the stereochemistry, was the most important for the inhibition.
