Files Advanced System Care (Windows Only)_v23.06.15. .Q: Use of loop.close() in Python I have a Python script which uses `psycopg2` to run a query and save the result to a `.csv` file. I have since realised that the query runs forever. I have tracked it down to the fact that I was not closing the cursor connection at the end of the script. I understand that this will slow down my application, but is there any reason why the script will not time out if the cursor is not closed? I am running the script on a Python 2.7.6 Jython 2.5.5 JVMs.

Cheers A: If you had a long-running process that created a resource you didn't want to lose, you could use a `try/finally` block to close the resource regardless of whether the process was successful or not. For example: `try: # do something that might fail except: #... handle error (or not) finally: # close the resource` This will help ensure that the resource is closed no matter what the error is, whether by the `except` or by the `finally` block. In your case, you don't have a resource to close, because you're not creating any, but it's still a good idea to always clean up after yourself. It's nice to be able to trust your programs to be clean.
