The story starts with a July 2017 report from the Washington Post, which showed that Windows 10 Mobile had just surpassed Android and iOS in market share. According to the report, Windows 10 Mobile had a 16 percent share of the smartphone market, compared to just 10 percent for Android and 12 percent for iOS. Microsoft apparently hadn't given Windows 10 Mobile a full quarter's worth of time to catch up to the competition. In the fourth quarter of 2017, Microsoft's cloud platform Azure continued to dominate its competitors. Microsoft had an operating margin of more than 60 percent for Azure, while Amazon Web Services and Google had margins of just over 10 percent. Microsoft's margins were even higher for its other cloud products. Microsoft's server products were even more profitable than their cloud offerings. The lack of transparency about server profitability resulted in some heads being put on Twitter. "This is insane," Azure CEO Scott Guthrie wrote. "Applies to all of us. This quarter was pretty easy for us. This stuff won't happen again. Right?" Microsoft's Terry Myerson, Microsoft's head of Windows engineering, made similar comments in a private Twitter conversation with someone else. "I'm not even a CFO [chief financial officer] at Microsoft," he wrote. "I just work on Windows Server." Microsoft has changed the way it reports server-related earnings in recent years, in an effort ca3bf1094
