Telomere dysfunction, defined as the inappropriate length of telomeres that leads to telomere replication, is commonly observed in human cancers. Telomere repeat factor 2 (TRF2), the core component of mammalian telomeric complex, plays essential roles in maintaining telomere length and stability. It has been reported that tumors lacking telomeric TRF2 function are highly radiosensitive, indicating the importance of proper TRF2 expression. In this study, we generated a conditional dominant-negative TRF2 (DN-TRF2) mouse model for developing more efficient in vivo tumorigenesis studies. Mice carrying the floxed TRF2 allele were crossed with transgenic Cdkn2a-Cre mice to induce selective expression of the DN-TRF2 mutant in the gastric mucosa. Our results demonstrated that gastric mucosa with DN-TRF2 expression developed into adenocarcinoma, whereas those of Cdkn2a-Cre/+; floxed TRF2 mice remained normal, suggesting that TRF2 is essential for maintaining telomere stability and for preventing genome instability and cancer progression. For those who don't know (but I bet some of you will), Microsoft's Home and Start screen is getting an update, and you'll have the option to download it as soon as the beta rolls out this weekend. This update doesn't seem very big (less than 10 MB), but it'll sure make your Windows 7 experience a little less boring. The updates should also make the switching between apps much smoother than it was before, and the new unified search feature will be a big help to those people who were using Bing for search, but can't quite make the shift to the Windows 8 search widget. The new unified search should also let you search inside the Start screen, which could be a nice help to those who were trying to find things under the Search charm. The new unified search seems to work a little better on the desktop, but it does use Bing
