with Failed Result..Q: How to handle a new server with NO monitor? We have a Linux system running some services 24/7. We have recently bought a new server which will handle the remaining load. I'd like to know which is the best way to monitor it. Currently we only have SSH access to it, so our monitoring software will run from the command line. What would be the best way to monitor it? My first thought was to install SSHd on it and use SCOT to see if it is alive. Or maybe I just have to write some C to interact with the service directly from my GUI? If there is a way, that would be great!

A: The official way is to use a program specifically designed to monitor services, such as Monit. SCOT is not nearly as easy to use or as flexible as Monit and it doesn't have the same level of feature-set either. You're also forgetting one of the biggest parts of using a monitoring system, which is when things go wrong. You don't need a GUI (or any means of remotely accessing it) to monitor the status of the application. If it stops working, SCOT won't give you any indication of it. Monit would. _type;
