Grisel-based computational tools for design of acetylcholinesterase inhibitors: identification of novel acylcholinesterase and plasma membrane acetylcholinesterase inhibitors. The design of new acetylcholinesterase (AChE) inhibitors remains a potential approach for the therapy of dementia, but experimental design has proved insufficient to produce AChE inhibitors with clinically useful efficacy. In this study, we developed four different computational tools named GRASP-0, GRASP-1, GRASP-2 and FMO-BP, which are combination of Grameen Research Association for Sustainable Population (GRASP) with Bemis-Murcko scaffold (GRASP-2), Fukui reactivity (GRASP-1), leading oriented molecular orbitals (FMO-BP), to identify novel AChE inhibitors. These computational tools were tested on a dataset of 845 known AChE inhibitors, and the results revealed that GRASP-0 has the lowest potential energy, -4.586 kJ/mol, and the highest enrichment on the training set with 77.5%. GRASP-1 has the highest potential energy, -4.517 kJ/mol, and the highest enrichment with 91.3%. GRASP
