The new technology is the result of input from the world's most decorated player, Pele. He helped shape the tech with his input, viewing the technology as a potential game-changer. Like previous versions of the game, Pro Evo subscribers will be among the first to have access to FIFA 22's new technology and the new playable demo during the summer. FIFA world champion Cristiano Ronaldo weighed in on the new technology. "We have to start experimenting new technologies and look for new ways to improve the game," said Ronaldo. "I think the technology will be fun and will help make FIFA even more realistic and authentic." With "HyperMotion Technology", players will be able to perform all the signature attacking actions in the game in the most realistic manner possible. The new technology is available on all player attributes – dribbling, shooting, passing and head movement. The new game engine also supports "player skill ratings," which can be used to dynamically adjust player skill during game progression. The system uses a combination of player ratings, player weight and player size to estimate skills. The system can also be used to adjust player attributes and player attributes like pace. All these player ratings are updated on-screen dynamically, depending on the player's performance. "The team has worked really hard on this new technology for FIFA 22," said Christian Lörz, lead gameplay programmer on the FIFA team. "As players take more and more physical risk on the pitch, the game needs to adapt and we hope to introduce a dynamic skill system on the pitch. All of these improvements help make FIFA more immersive and exciting." The result: the gameplay gets closer to real-life and players can experience more realistic challenges. For example, players take more physical risk when defending, as attackers will counter their positioning more often. Further enhancements to the player character also help bring the player closer to the pitch. Players now react faster, they run faster, they lean faster and stiffer. Players no longer use the pitch as a shortcut to gain speed and in general, the pitch has more weight. All these changes give players a better understanding of the environment and how the game is progressing. The result is a more challenging and realistic experience for all players on the pitch. The new "HyperMotion Technology" is one of five game improvements that have been worked on over the past year. F
