What's new:

Hnefatafl (; English translation: Oath of the slain) is a board wargame (war game) of Scandinavian origin. It is probably the earliest surviving Scandinavian war game, of which the exact date of invention is uncertain. Its name comes from the oath that players must swear to play the game honestly. It was first played publicly in 1625-26, at a banquet given by King Christian IV of Denmark at Copenhagen. The game arrived in England in 1681 and was popular at the court of King Charles II. The game is believed to be the predecessor of chess, but whether it was ultimately directly inspired by chess is unknown. The game is played on a four-foot by four-foot planked surface covered with 4 inches of sand. Each player has 38 independent pieces. These may be mounted on 50 rollers, each 7 inches long, at each corner of the board. Any two adjacent rollers may be connected by wires, a technique called stibbing. Each player's king, defence and set of pawns are mounted on one roller. Hnefatafl is usually played with seven sets, with half the pieces of one set removed from the board to form each player's reserve. In the version published by Queens' Book Club in London (2004), only four sets of pieces are required, but it is possible to play seven sets. It is sometimes incorrectly played in teams of four; all four sides of the board then become players. Typically, two games are scheduled on the same day. Variations and clones Hnefatafl is played on a rectangular board, 4 feet long. Players alternate placing their pieces at the corners and centres of the board, with kings placed in the middle. Three or four sets of 35 pieces may be used (4 × 50), and it may or may not be possible to reserve pieces for the opponent. In team matches played as four vs. four, each side has the same number of sets of pieces, the game is not run out but the players have to play to four points rather than one. Game pieces There are six sets of differently numbered pieces. The pieces are the same shape and differ only in size. The larger pieces tend to be slightly easier to move and guard than their smaller counterparts. The 'kings' have a 3½" head. The 'kings' are mounted on the central 'king' roller, of which there is one

The great genius of Angkor, the magnificent mystical place was discovered by accident. I'd been on my first solo backpacking journey from the UK and Cambodia was my second destination. My hotel was around 7 kilometers outside of the main Angkor Wat temple. On my way to the ruins, I passed by a series of stupas on a hill. One of them caught my eye, it was exceptionally well preserved. On further investigation I found that they were all built in the 14th century and so it was evident this was a Buddhist monastery. I'd heard that the monks of Angkor built their own cars to ferry them around Angkor. I had to see if this was true. I set off up the hill, which was steep and rocky at times. Following

Say you have a web app that is in a sub-folder on your server from your domain root, the url for example is: What's changed is the web server's DocumentRoot can't be included any more and the web server is set up to only allow read access: allow from all So when somebody crawls dev.example.com, he gets a directory listing of /path/to as designed. But then once the web server gets a request for index.php, it does a UID check and will only serve up the index.php of the document root if the UID matches what it expected it was for. So within that allows by default in the web server is if the user's UID matches, it would
