infiltration of leukocytes into a microfluidic environment is an important part of the immune response. However, little is known about the dynamics of the leukocyte-microenvironment interactions that occur in these environments. Here, we present a method that we use to characterize the recruitment and/or migration of leukocytes into microfluidic environments. Specifically, we used a novel in vitro assay format in which leukocytes are trapped in a microfluidic environment that is dynamically perfused with blood. In this study, leukocytes were exposed to  $^{14}\text{C}$ -labeled acetate ( $[^{14}\text{C}]\text{acetate}$ ) that is incorporated into the acetyl-coenzyme A (CoA) pool of the cell. The label is then used to characterize the initial response of leukocytes to chemoattractants, although it is also a significant producer of energy for the cell. To measure the rate of incorporation of  $[^{14}\text{C}]\text{acetate}$ , leukocytes were incubated under a variety of conditions, and labeled leukocytes were then isolated. The  $[^{14}\text{C}]\text{acetate}$ incorporation rate, which is dependent on the metabolic activity of the cell, was determined by measuring the activity of soluble aconitase in the extracellular medium of the cells using a radiochemical assay. Analysis of the [14C]acetate incorporation rate indicates that the primary initial response of leukocytes in microfluidic environments, to many chemoattractants, is an increase in the cell's metabolism. This dynamic capability is likely to be
