The overall objective of the proposed research is to isolate, purify, and chemically characterize the components of a mammalian plasma membrane-located phospholipase which we have recently discovered to occur in vitro. We intend to isolate and purify the phospholipase from guinea pig liver, and we are further planning to use the protein to develop a stable radioimmunoassay for the enzyme. In addition we plan to develop a radioimmunoassay for the phospholipase A2 inhibitors such as Arachis hypogea, jojoba, kappa-casein and bovine serum albumin. A second objective is to further purify and characterize the substrate, lysophosphatidylcholine, which is hydrolyzed by the phospholipase. We intend to investigate the effect of a series of fluorescent and radioactive derivatives of lysophosphatidylcholine on the normal phospholipase reaction and phospholipid transfer protein reaction. We also plan to investigate the possibility that the phospholipase or phospholipase A2 inhibitors may be the circulating factors that control and are responsible for the rate of arachidonic acid mobilization in response to ischemia and reperfusion. Spread the love Wonder-Paul

I have come up with the best course of action and would like to see others input. What we are doing is to do a 1v1 challenge where one uses an EMP strike and the other player must protect their robot. First to stop each other's robot wins. My objectives are to protect the robot, and to keep a minimum number of turns to do so. I am currently looking to protect the robot for 10 turns. My understanding is that every turn that I am protecting the robot, I lose a turn. However, I have spent my turns attacking and protecting. In my round of 15, I would run out of the time if I tried to defend for that long. I would normally have a turn left for each strike against the robot. Any inputs or insights would be very helpful. I have all the required components in place. I have the HGC weapons with shields, I have a robot powerful enough to take out the robot, and I am working on a robot to protect the robot. We are still waiting on the HGC walls. IF I am correct and I am in 10 turn mode, I lose the robot when I need 5 turns left. I have 5 turns left. If the robot is protected, then I would have 1 turn left. The way I see it, I would like to win if I can get the robot to a minimum length of time. I am planning on giving every turn I spend protecting the robot away. You can't really win if you spend all of your time protecting the robot. In my experience the longer you keep your opponent from striking you, the better your chance to win. If your keeping all of your enemies time under 10 turns, you have a serious advantage, but I don't think it's really legal. T
