cytotoxicity of nickel and copper in human cells: effects of antioxidants, glutathione synthesis and the cells' health status. The question of whether metals are toxic has far-reaching implications for environmental, public and occupational safety. In this study, we have investigated the cytotoxicity of nickel and copper in cultured human cells and assessed the effects of antioxidants, glutathione synthesis and cell health status on this toxicity. The results show that the concentrations of

Ni(2+) and Cu(2+) tolerated by human cells in vitro are about an order of magnitude higher than those routinely detected in human blood plasma, and that these tolerable concentrations are no different, for Ni(2+) and Cu(2+), whether supplemented or not, in the medium. Depletion of glutathione levels below a critical threshold (50-70% of normal levels) had a cytotoxic effect on cells, but this effect was independent of metal concentration. Supplementing the medium with ascorbate or cysteine, or increasing the levels of glutathione or alpha-tocopherol in the culture medium, did not reduce the cytotoxicity of Ni(2+) or Cu(2+) for this range of concentrations. Our findings do not support the hypothesis that intracellular glutathione status

Write your own IDS with SSH and scan your network for bad guys. SPAMCop is a free email and website scraper for detecting and removing spam and malware. SPAMCop is the home of the popular SPAMCop.net Spam Crawler. Menu Neural Network The following is a video taken during a lecture I gave at the University of Hawaii, Honolulu, in 2014. The content is focused on how to design, build, and deploy a neural network on Ubuntu. For more information, please see the video - Here is the abstract: This tutorial aims to showcase how to design, build, and deploy a high-performance deep neural network on a Linux-based machine such as Ubuntu. It is a very high-level tutorial and hence the audience is expected to have a reasonable level of programming experience as well. The example includes the use of libraries such as Java, Jython, Python, OpenCV, Scikit-Learn, and TensorFlow. Code samples are taken from projects I have developed recently and I have put a lot of effort in making them work together. In the first part of this tutorial, the basics of Python programming will be covered, starting from the basics of the language itself. Then, we will move on to NumPy, which is a library for numerical computing and efficient matrix operations

System Requirements:

Intel Core i7-980 CPU 8GB RAM NVIDIA GeForce GTX 880 or equivalent 4K display (1080p or higher preferred)
