Included in this category would be for example, a security camera, a sensor attached to a circuit board, a security audit system, a hardware module, an embedded system (such as a modem, RF, etc. etc.). In this case is a mini serial to usb converter. The advantage of this device is the capacity to convert the data contained in the serial line in the USB port. A: I once worked in a building with a security camera system that used a serial hub to multiplex the video. It was a self-contained multiplexer/demultiplexer/controller/power supply and similar equipment. I don't recall how they read the data or how they sent the data. But they had an RS232 interface. A: RS-232, of course. In software speak, it is serial comms. However, if you're working with larger amounts of data, the benefit of USB disappears. In those cases, you might look at using RS-485
