In particular, the present disclosure relates to cutting machines that a user may load with a work piece, such as a bar or bat, and then rotate or twist the work piece while the cutting machine is used to cut the work piece. Many cutting machines are capable of performing a single operation to cut or shape a work piece. For example, a cutting machine may be capable of cutting a work piece along a single axis. Alternatively, the cutting machine may be capable of cutting the work piece in two dimensions, such as by cutting the work piece along a first axis and a second axis, perpendicularly to the first axis. A cutting machine may also be capable of cutting the work piece into a number of different shapes. Some cutting machines employ one or more bit holders that are able to hold one or more bits that cut the work piece. In operation, the user places a bit in a bit holder, and causes the cutting machine to cut a work piece in the desired shape. In some cases, the bit holder may be located on a protruding portion of a cutting machine, such as on the end of the cutting machine, and a bit may be pushed into the bit holder and caused to cut a work piece. In other cases, the bit holder may be located in a cavity of a cutting machine, with the bit protruding from the cavity. To cut a work piece
