INTRODUCTION {#sec1-1}

The extraction of large deeply impacted third molars is one of the most common procedures performed under general anesthesia. Immediate postoperative pain and bleeding are potential complications and can be successfully managed by means of local anesthesia. However, patients who have undergone a previous operation under general anesthesia, or in whom mouth opening is limited, often complain about soreness after the extraction of impacted third molars in the mandible region. Reports of soreness due to intraoral surgery have been published, but few have reported postoperative complications due to oral surgery. Many studies have been done on alveolar and auriculotemporal nerve block or infiltration block with topical anesthetics, but few studies have compared the effect of these types of anesthesia to the effect of the block with general anesthesia. The aim of this study was to evaluate postoperative soreness in mandibular third molar extraction in patients who received postoperative pain control by means of local anesthesia and those who received postoperative pain control by means of general anesthesia. METHODS {#sec1-2} ===== A randomized, double-blind study was performed on 60 patients, 30 in each group. The patients were selected from the Department of Oral and Maxillofacial Surgery at the University of Toyama and were classified into the following three groups: the local anesthesia group, which received local anesthesia; the infiltration group, which received infiltration anesthesia; and the general anesthesia group, which received general anesthesia. Twenty-four patients were male and 36 were female with a mean age of 29 years (range, 18--43 years). These patients underwent the extraction of mandibular third molars at the UMIN Clinical Trial Center, Toyama, Japan, during the period from February 2007 to May 2009. The patients were randomized into the three groups. All the patients received the same preoperative preparations including examinations of all the oral cavities, diagnoses of gingivitis and periodontal disease

Interferon-beta in the treatment of chronic Lyme disease. Interferon-beta may improve the delayed treatment response in chronic Lyme disease. We conducted a two-year, randomized, double-blind trial of intramuscular interferon-beta-1b therapy in adult patients with chronic Lyme disease and have now completed the third year of the study. We enrolled 72 patients in two treatment groups: group 1, interferon-beta-1b, 6 million international units three times a week; group 2, placebo. Overall, the clinical results were similar to those we had previously reported for patients receiving identical treatment at a lower dosage and with the same dose frequency. Although we continued to see occasional treatment failures, in general, patients in both groups had a significant improvement in overall symptoms, joint pain, and range of motion. Interferon-beta therapy appeared to be safe and well tolerated. Long-term follow-up studies with higher doses are needed to determine the optimal duration and
