What's new:

ium in Ireland The Privilege of the Land Abstract, with Short Historical Background, by Edith Jackman Introduction Long before 1965 there were well known Irish land theory thinkers who argued that the state would eventually have to recognise that there was no basis to its claim to ownership of fee simple simple of the land generally, or indeed the specific territory of the state itself. The notion of a 'social order', or 'good order' as described by Thomas Hobbes, was recognised by Hegel as implicitly recognising the limits on one's ownership power. Since the 1800s there has been a gradual process of State recognition of a primitive 'easement' rights of public rights held by a range of urban bodies and institutions, this most recent instance being the Supreme Court's finding in May 2005 that Irish State landowners were bound to make such easement available to the Environmental Protection Agency for all of Ireland. This is not to deny that there is a basis of much law that seeks to address this issue legally, constitutionally and politically but this was not argued by these defenders and is not the main focus of this article. In the absence of such quasi-common law the position of the Church in Ireland is a very different one. So long as a Catholic wanted or considered it best to protect and develop the resources within its territory, what it held was said to be 'instrumentum regale' and as such it was presumed to be the property of the monarch, that is at the heart of feudalism. Thomas Hobbes claimed that the authority of the sovereign was such that it could be granted or sold (Hobbes, Liberalism Reinterpreted, 51-52). He also drew a parallel between the sovereign's duties to control the people within his territory, as with a liege lord protecting his serfs, and the Church when it controlled land grants in its territory. Thomas Smith noted that enfeoffments were sometimes held from previous kings (Smith, Elements of Polite Learning, 237). The Church's rights in these areas were based on the medieval right of first possession and the 1301 annulment of the Norman invasion. In England, Hervey of Alton claimed that primogeniture created an independent title, a similitude of landed property, this being part of her concept of 'similitude', a form of autonomous authority. This notion was emphasised by Victoria and
