Application of low-intensity pulsed ultrasound for increasing the fracture callus formation rate in calcaneal fracture. To increase the callus formation rate in calcaneal fracture, we conducted a study to determine the effects of low-intensity pulsed ultrasound (LIPUS) on patients with unstable heel fractures that were surgically treated. The patients' ages ranged from 16 to 78 years (mean age, 43.2 years), and the duration of follow-up averaged 32.4 months. LIPUS was applied with an impulse transducer at the fracture site of the calcaneus after surgery. The duration of LIPUS application was 6 weeks. The results were evaluated according to the Sakaura criteria. The results were significantly superior in patients treated with LIPUS than in those treated without LIPUS. The overall rate of callus formation was 86.5%. Percutaneous LIPUS may be applied to enhance fracture callus formation in unstable calcaneal fractures. Ush Vanka is a small village located in Vavuniya, northern Sri Lanka. On March 27, 2009, two rounds of shelling took place in the village, during which 28 civilians died, the vast majority of them children. At the time, the Sri Lankan Army believed that rebels had made holes in the ground around the village, thereby giving the rebels an advantage in the artillery shelling. The first round of shelling took place at 3:35 a.m. (local time) on March 27, 2009. The second round of shelling began about four hours later. In each round of shelling, thousands of artillery shells, mortars, and rockets were fired. The average number of artillery shells were 20,000 per round. In the first round of shelling, 37 civilians were killed. The Sri Lankan Army estimated that they believed that there were between 20 and 40 rebels hiding behind civilian homes. As a result of the shelling, six of the houses were completely destroyed, 20 were partially destroyed, 20 suffered minor damage, and one suffered moderate damage. On April 10, 2009, the Sri Lank
