A: The fastest way would be to add the following to a bash script: #!/bin/bash xforce_exe_path=/path/to/your/exefile.exe xforce_exe_arg1=File01Argument1 xforce_exe_arg2=File01Argument2 xforce_exe_arg3=File01Argument3 xforce_exe_arg4=File01Argument4 # If the 'file' command doesn't work, you may need to get this from the PATH ["${(command-which file)}"] || export PATH=$PATH:/path/to/your/file" $xforce_exe_path "${xforce_exe_arg1}" "${xforce_exe_arg2}" "${xforce_exe_arg3}"
"${xforce_exe_arg4}" You can then run the script like so: ./script.sh File01Argument1 File01Argument2 File01Argument3 File01Argument4 I've tested it on Windows, and I think it should work on Mac OSX too. The present invention pertains to conductive ink, or, more specifically, to a conductive ink which is useful as a conductive vehicle for a conductive paper for use in electrical, electronic, and electro-optic devices and in a conductive coating for use in, for example, electrical insulation. The demand for transparent conductive paper has grown as display technology has advanced. High-conductivity transparent conductive paper is also needed for electrical applications such as capacitive touch screens. In the past, three-dimensionally and densely distributed conductive inks have been difficult to achieve. Conductive inks and paper which are currently in use are based on metal particles, metal oxide particles, carbon black, and carbon particles dispersed in vehicle carriers. Dispersing conductive particles in these carriers and then applying the conductive particles to paper results in a fine, three-dimensional conductive network. Conductive paper in this manner has a conducting surface area of approximately only 3%. In addition, such materials are not optimized with regard to material properties or cost. It would be desirable to have a conductive paper which has a conducting surface area of 70%-90%. It would also be desirable to provide such a paper which is optimized with regard to material properties
