When Kublai Khan sent his troops to subdue Japan in 1281, it looked like there would be no major resistance. The shogun, a Fujiwara clan leader, and his generals were defeated, and the country was opened up for the Yuan empire to expand. But the people of Japan had other ideas. The Japanese sword clans had a long history of resistance to foreign rule, and managed to stop the Mongol invasion. Now they must take the fight to them. The story begins at the moment the Mongol army has just reached the gates of Kyoto, the historic capital of Japan. The ruthless Mongol commander, Horikawa, is hoping to bring a swift end to this resistance by ordering his men to destroy everything in their path. Horikawa's plan is to quickly push deep into the country and finish the job quickly, so he ignores the mounting resistance of the samurai outside his encampment. Even worse, he makes a huge mistake, ordering an overly large force of Mongol riders through the capital. At this moment, a great tumult begins. The first thing to come rushing up are the swift onrushing hooves of the huge Mongol cavalry charges. First they are met by a small group of defiant samurai, courageously fighting to protect their home. The quick, fluid movements of the Japanese cavalry use a style known as “Hyakunin-ryū”, a term that literally means “movements that look like swift winds”. They fight with speed and daring, using quick yet precise motions, and at full speed they can easily overtake even the mounted Mongols. Now the main force of the Mongols has reached the gates of Kyoto, and the actual combat begins. They are armed with spears and swords, and they fight with total desperation. The Mongol commander, Horikawa, falls. His men follow him down to their death. The samurai, clad in their armour, fighting for their country's freedom, stand in front of their fallen commander and continue fighting with swords and spears, blocking the way to the prize that Horikawa fought for so dearly. In the end, Japan is subdued and Horikawa has lost. The Mongols have entered Kyoto, but they will not rest. The samurai fight on, even though they are outnumbered, they know how things are and they know what their goal is. Their objective is not to defeat the Mongols, their objective is to drive them out of Japan. In short, they must resist the invasion. At this point

Kurotarou -G-MODE Archives-
[Official Page] Two brothers, Kuro and Tarou, are fighting for the last time in the 47th battle. Kuro's boss said that "a power even stronger than his has appeared in this battle." An unexpected attack came from this boss and Kuro was killed. Before that happened, Kuro was said to have said "Even if I die, our blood will continue to flow! I will never lose to those without hearts!" Kuro's last words were words of challenge. On this battlefield, both Kuro and Tarou cry. Tarou who is the strongest enemy in Kuro's life, went on the attack. His arms make a "Ka!" sound with each attack. Kuro: "Argh! My body..." Tarou: "You're a really weakling!" As Tarou's arms continued to roar with a "Ka!" sound, Kuro realizes he's not going to win this battle. A large scowl was on Kuro's face and the lightness in his eyes was slowly fading. Kuro's left arm was holding his katana. "Don't tell me, you're gonna die before me?!" With the words Kuro had let go of his katana. Kuro has never had the guts to aim for his opponent. "This is my last battle! " With his left hand, Kuro swatted the air with his katana. (Before this was after this was) Kuro's katana suddenly began to vibrate violently. The blade stopped vibrating just before it hit the ground. Kuro's left hand grasped his hand around his katana's handle. Kuro looked at his hand and asked in a low voice: "Why did it stop?" Tarou nodded "Yes, I understand" and continued his attack. Kuro with a loud "Ka!" sound, suddenly slashed Tarou's left leg. (before this was after this was) "Aaaaah!" "What?" Tarou: "Kuhuhuhuh" Tarou: "I- I don't understand"

What's new:

Conference Play to Miss Playoffs The draft landed you a Bobby Ryan, a franchise-changing phenom, but have you looked behind the scenes at Bobby Flay's teenaged daughter? Chances are she has a magic formula to transform your stale waffle fries into nouvelle cuisine of the chewy/juicy variety. OK, we're not actually trying to sell anything, but Drew Brees is Drew Brees still and this horse has outrun the car. (Finally!) How Many Non-Playoff Games Will It Take Before Someone Impresses and Keeps the Job? 36 — Bob Stoops If there's a single play in college football that dominates the hearts of coaches and suits in the commodities pit, it's The Bob Delay. Cut! Cut! Cut! Cut! OK, we're pretty sure Stoops is secretly a Mormon and he could kick himself in the ass for using such a cliché right now. But as nice as he is and as dignified as his hairline is, 'perfectly coiffed' has always worked better than 'Bob Stoops,' so we'll make an exception. 34 — Scott Pioli Almost exactly one third of the way through the roller coaster of Pioli experience (Blitzberg on steroids, "Never too old to do it right"), he's already sold the network on being the nouveau ball club GM and the best pickup-and-trade team in the league. But unlike every other head coach that has managed to be fired, Pioli wasn't scapegoated and he sure as hell isn't fighting for his job, so he's got time on his side. Maybe even an early retirement is in the cards like a fair and generous businessman who is upfront about how great he is, easygoing to a fault, and totally efficient. 32 — Urban Meyer The grand talker, the more-a-chicken-than-a-cyborg, the lightning before the storm — comes expiration time on domestic abuse. Only, guess what, Urban? The chickens aren't crowing here; they're chicken-squishing. He hasn't had a player suspended in three years and the Florida penal code just went into effect that make consensual dominance and excessive force non-existent, so there's a little wiggle room for Penn State fans — that is unless their crazy-ass quarterback found himself an attractive next-door neighbor — but guess what? 32 —
