Proteins act as metal-chelating agents for copper and zinc in Escherichia coli. The use of a copper repressing transcriptional repressor to overcome the antibiotic resistance phenotype observed on a copper-dependent bacteriophage T7 system was accompanied by the recovery of phage growth. A copper-dependent protease was determined to possess transcriptional repression activity. The transcriptional repressor could be demonstrated to sequester the metal ion necessary for protease activity. This example points out the importance of metal-chelating proteins as metal-storage molecules whose redistribution within a cell can affect essential gene products. But denying that it had anything to do with Apple's requests is like saying the Mafia doesn't own the Don. "Apple gave us their invitation list. We have nothing to do with Apple's work on iOS 7," says Gruber. "We created the home screen UI and we're satisfied with how well it works." No, he makes it clear, he is not satisfied with how "well it works" from the perspective of making it look like an iPhone. You can think of Gruber as Apple's version of John Gruber — which is to say, a machine code wonk, occasionally nice and magnanimous, with a deep understanding of the inner workings of Apple's products. For a bit of proof of this, just look at how closely he mirrored Phil Schiller's announcement of iOS 7, right down to the slide on his podcast, with pictures of iOS 6 and iOS 7 side by side. Gruber has been kinder in his commentary on the forthcoming iPhone 5s, which he's more than happy to talk about with Phil Schiller. This fall, all the usual Apple predictable blather about the iPhone 5s's zero day cycle (the difference between the iPhone 5 and the 5s is that the 5s has 12 months of zero day testing)
