A recurring dream for many cannabis users: Toward better marijuana It's two in the morning and you're sitting in a spare, clean apartment. You're stoned and have no idea why. You don't even know what day it is. Then you notice a familiar song is playing. It starts with a piano. You hear the chord progression. "Love," by the Beatles. No, not that song. The other one. It's the title track to the 1966 English-language version of the Beatles' animated movie Yellow Submarine. You're watching animated characters on the TV, and the colors are all very bright, like something from a 1960s kaleidoscope. There are a lot of boats with a lot of colors. It's a pleasure garden. The body of a woman from a previous life floats in front of the TV. It's transparent, which is the last thing you expect in a public installation. You don't see her. It's more like a memory than a person. It only lasts an instant, but it's there in the room. You have no idea who she was. You don't even really remember what she looks like. But you can hear the musical notes. You can hear them all. It's like you're sitting in a pot of marijuana. The drug is having an effect, and you're experiencing something you've never experienced before. You find it easier to concentrate. You feel a sense of satisfaction, like you are more in the moment. You've never understood why some people hate pot. But you know the drug is good for some people. You don't know what it's good for you, but you know it's right for you. It's your life, your choice. The pot is not alone
