Relationship of cell membrane composition to drug uptake and toxicity in three drug-sensitive and three drug-resistant mouse cell lines. The objective of this study was to test the hypothesis that drug uptake and toxicity in drug-sensitive mouse cells are associated with a phospholipid composition resembling that of cell plasma membranes, while uptake and toxicity in drug-resistant cells are associated with a composition resembling that of the plasma membrane of that cell type. Therefore, the association of phospholipid to arachidonic acid ratios of the plasma membranes of these six cell lines were determined. Cell membrane phosphatidylethanolamine (PE) composition of the three drug-sensitive cell lines was indistinguishable (1.05 mol% PE, 20.6% PE + 34.6% PE + 45.8%), whereas, the two drug-resistant cell lines had higher ratios of PE to phosphatidylcholine (PC) (1.79 mol% PE, 65.6% PE + 28.8% PE + 0.6%). In the resistant cell lines, the
