The role of the current interventional cardiology practice in the management of patients with congestive heart failure: a national survey. We sought to study the current national trends of angiography and clinical indications for angiography in patients with angina, ischemia and congestive heart failure (CHF). Prospective study. The survey was conducted at six randomly selected centers located in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico. Of the 545 patients in the study, 369 were admitted to undergo angiography for angina pectoris, 217 for myocardial infarction (MI), and 89 for CHF. The diagnosis of CHF was based on clinical data and echocardiographic evidence of systolic dysfunction. Of the entire study cohort, 69.4% of patients underwent angiography for the diagnosis of CHF, whereas 23.7% of CHF patients underwent angiography for the investigation of angina pectoris and 5.7% for MI. Angiography was performed in 96% of patients with CHF for the purpose of coronary revascularization. Angiography was performed in 75.4% of patients with MI for the investigation of coronary anatomy and the decision to revascularize in 42.5% of patients. The overall rate of angiography for the investigation of coronary anatomy and the decision to revascularize in patients with MI was 36.2%. Among patients admitted for CHF, routine coronary angiography was performed in only 39% of patients with CHF. Among patients admitted for CHF with angina pectoris or MI, coronary angiography was performed in 80% of cases. Compared with data from the Cooperative study of Myocardial Infarction (CSMI), 11% less angiography and 21% less coronary revascularization were performed in our study cohort. A complete revascularization was documented in 86.5% of patients with angina and in 79% of patients with MI. Our results indicate that a considerable number of patients with CHF are not referred for coronary angiography. Furthermore, less than half of the patients with CHF have a coronary angiography performed. In contrast, this procedure is performed at a very high rate in patients with MI. Although these findings indicate that the appropriate use of coronary angiography and intervention is being addressed in some practices in the United States, there are still significant areas in which results may be improved.Saskatoon's city council took

Defined release of catecholamines from bovine adrenal chromaffin cells in culture. Chromaffin cells were prepared from bovine adrenal gland and incubated under serum-free conditions in vitro. The release of catecholamines (CA) was measured by a spectrofluorimetric assay using a monoclonal antibody to CA. A single cell suspension was incubated in the presence of serum-free defined medium. The addition of 250 mM KCl resulted in a rapidly increase in the release of CA over a 30 min period, as measured by peak concentrations of 780 +/- 40 nM (P less than 0.01). The addition of 1 mM ouabain increased the release of CA by almost a factor of 3 over that observed in the control incubations. The effect of ouabain was not reversed by the subsequent addition of 6 mM KCl, indicating that it is not a consequence of an increase in the release of CA. Bilateral noradrenaline depletion of cultured chromaffin cells by prolonged depolarization or by continuous exposure to desmethylimipramine resulted in a fall in the release of CA from these cells. However, the release of CA from cultured chromaffin cells could be augmented by adding CaCl2 or forskolin to the serum-free defined medium.Q: How to build a gradient stroke in Illustrator?
