control two distinct systems, the first being control of the brake system (disengagement of the clutch and brakes) and the second being control of the auxiliary system (engagement of the clutch and engine). The auxiliary system can include hydraulic systems to control the steering system and/or transmission system. Control of the auxiliary system, as well as the brake system, can be accomplished using the control pedals. Disengagement of the clutch occurs by stepping on a clutch pedal. The clutch pedal is preferably shaped with a concave or, desirably, substantially spherical indentation, formed in the pedal. The pedal depression is felt by the driver. Stepping on the clutch pedal causes disengagement of the clutch of the automobile and, thereby, disengagement of the engine. To disengage the clutch, the clutch pedal is depressed. Stepping off the clutch pedal results in the clutch reengaging and engagement of the engine. In addition to the clutch pedal, the automobile includes a brake pedal. The brake pedal is in a unique position on the automobile and is only used to control the brakes. Stepping on the brake pedal causes application of the brakes and, thereby, slows down the automobile. Stepping off of the brake pedal disengages the brakes and, thereby, frees them to operate again. The engine of the automobile is typically associated with a throttle control. There are several types of throttle controls. One type is an accelerator pedal that resembles a human foot. The accelerator pedal is positioned on the automobile and attached to the throttle control. The movement of the pedal moves the throttle control. The throttle
