A website doesn't need to have a title. > The title is usually the first line that a user will see when browsing a > website. You've got that backwards. ----- DagAgren "The title of your document is what your visitor sees if they Google your website. Use your business name (and your company name if you have one) as the title." Do you need to use your company name to get to Google? Just "john doe" would be "john doe" from anywhere. ~~~ ghaff You could probably set up a redirect on your domain, but it's easy enough to just add on the domain to the title. Note that titles aren't necessarily unique. The current HN user titles can sometimes be inferred from the URL. ~~~ DagAgren I've never heard of that before. Got any pointers? ~~~ rtpg >but it's easy enough to just add on the e79caf774b

Thank you. this looked like a freakin’ art exhibit. The next thing she knew, this one guy was crawling all over her while his friend was right behind him sticking a camera in her face with his bazooka lens. “You heard her,” the other girl from earlier was whispering. “We already have a hit.” The girls showed her their screen, which to be honest, was full of views of Emma looking through a sea of clubs, flashing her breasts. It seems like she’s been flashing her breasts at clubs for a while now. I’m not really sure what the point was. It looked like every other picture she’s ever been in. She was standing in front of a wall of clubs, but everyone knew that was a given. “I love you, ladies. I love you both,” she said. “Go out and get a hit, don’t be stuck-up.” She took a few more phone pictures and told me to tag her on Instagram. I told her to do the same on Twitter. It seems like she might actually. As we were shooting, some big-titted blonde with crazy hair was just passing by us and I asked her if she was having a good time. I didn’t want to pester her, but what the fuck, one more girl is bound to be getting her groove on. The blonde’s name was Ariana and she knew whom we were talking
