Namtai Software Power ISO Windows 7® Sp2 Offline Installer - FREE Download . Monitor your logitech wireless keyboard and mouse with a short glance. Namtai Software offers the following features: Scrolling Keyboard Explorer . Q: How can I import a class at runtime? I have an app, which uses a simple templating engine. The app has two views: one for indexing and one for browse. When I click on a line, I want to load the corresponding page. The problem is, I can't assign an instance of the the class I'm importing at runtime, because the import statements are top-level statements and not statements within the module itself. The way to fix it is to assign the class as a global, and assign the global to an instance of the class. This breaks the encapsulation, though. I was wondering: are there any tools that look at the tree of your import statements and give you an import statement for the methods that exist in one package but don't exist in another? So, say I have these: import models import database import datetime import spam from django.template import Template, TemplateSyntaxError import sqlalchemy import logging import itertools Well, you can see that the models are in one file, and the rest are in others, but that's irrelevant. I think the question is: is there a tool that can pick a class, look at every object imported in a file and give you an import statement for all the methods within that class (or a package) that don't exist in any other classes? A: As already mentioned, I used Mako-log: Simply put, mako-log was written by the author of the Mako templating system, and therefore has a few more features than Sphinx and Mako-log. In particular, it allows you to import resources from files (imports in a Python file are called "Classes"), and
