I played over 200 hours of this game, taking it apart in various places (YouTube). Releases: Included in the game are 5 custom made songs with various drum kits (Metallica, The Rolling Stones, Lords of Acid, and me). There's even a song called 'Freeplay' to experiment in.

The game is released as an.exe file, not a.zip.

What's new:

Overlord. Ruined Temple Survivor. (In keeping with the Black Lagoon theme, many of the other Mechanoid Overlords are also named after classic Mexican cartoon characters. This is the recently "reimagined" Hombre Pintado, following an idea floated by a pre-release beta tester.) I thought this is a sweet idea until I actually took the time to play. Turns out I hate it to the point of boredom. Yes, the art style is cool and the location is nice, but the fun was squeezed out by...well, zilch. I'm good at loading screen puzzles and chaining a couple of the game's mechanics together, but pressing the random key three times to flip a number combination just doesn't come together to work the same way it does in AusGamers so many times. Same with the combat, where you're forced to press the A button and use a jump command (WASD movement just isn't enough with those damn quick-climbing enemy enemies) before even being able to cycle through your weapons. Despite the nuts and bolts of the mechanic, I do want to the right elements of the game to be kept. There was fun here. You flicked a rock on the side of the temple, watching a splat of blood ooze (but not too much!). You snuck up and knifed your enemy in the back, evading an enemy attack and throwing your sword in a roundabout motion. You chewed off some ears and probably got stung (maybe the woman had a good sense of smell - since she smelled like butter, or maybe it was just a bad day). You had at least one great moment that I'm very attached to. It's just that every time that moment came, the adventure turned into some form of irritation and tedium the entire time. With plenty of action scenes inspired from the Goomba-on-water fighting in Donkey Kong, but in spite of that, there was little substance. After a cool final battle, the scene would backtrack and return to the next trapdoor. A few more traps were blown, but nothing more. There were a couple of further levels - less traps, but again, nothing to do and no real puzzle solving to be had. You were a staunch survivor, you did not give up and you won. Maybe if I forced myself to push through
