company after company, the parameters of Social Media are being redefined. Google Plus has been launched, Myspace is attempting to be relevant again, and like I've said before, Twitter will be going completely public this fall. So what does this mean for the future of online advertising? Anyone who looks at the past can see that Social Media has always been a space for advertising. It's the quickest way to reach your customer. So what does it mean for companies like mine to take advantage of these new forms of technology? Well, one thing we can take away from this is the fact that data is data, and it's all very different. If Social Media was one thing in the past, and I'll admit that it was one hell of a lot of bullcrap; it's certainly different now. If you think about it, Facebook is, in fact, an advertising platform which runs at one tenth of Twitter's speed, which I believe is about 10 times as fast as a crawling search engine
