WSU - Billings " It is necessary that its reconstruction attract the attention of neighbouring countries, while the maintenance of the status quo, does nothing to secure the stability and security of the region and can even jeopardize the peace process". 19:27 Chapter 6: On the Origins of the Conflict It was Moscow who, on August 30, created an opportunity for the principal actors to return to the negotiation table and resolved a number of the remaining disagreements. On September 5, Abkhazia held the first elections since independence (the previous elections in 1993 were boycotted by Abkhazia and Georgia) and reported its first election results, a former rebel official defeated President Bagapsh by over 300 votes. On September 9, the newly elected President of South Ossetia Eduard Kokoity declared that he was no longer an obstacle to negotiations and was ready to participate in them; a week later, as Abkhazia saw the restoration of presidential elections, Bagapsh appointed Anri Jergenja as Prime Minister, in the hope of limiting his role to that of a mediator. In early October, Russia and Georgian leaders began to make progress in negotiations, and on October 15, Sergo Bagapsh, the President of Abkhazia, met with Georgian foreign Minister Giorgi Margvelashvili and Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov in Sochi. The negotiations led to the signing of the "Basic Principles" (22 October) and the "Ten Point Agreement" (5 November), both of which meant an end to the Abkhaz-Georgian conflict and the creation of a jointly administered state. On 15 November, in response to Russian demands that the Trans Abkhazia, the breakaway region of Abkhazia, be made part of the Russian Federation, NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer called on Moscow to withdraw its troops, and Western leaders began to agree that Russia should recognise de facto Abkhazia's independence. Also in October, Russian President Vladimir Putin signed a decree on the status of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which declared both secessionist regions autonomous republics within the Russian Federation. 18:50 Topic: 02cac431c2.
