the surface models are converted to the new file formats, e.g., asc/acd, by loading them into the keygen of the adobe acrobat version. conversion to a new file format can be accomplished by several operations. the file extension of a pdf file is set as '.pdf' by default. the file extension of a new file can be changed to '.asc' (adobe systems file) or '.acd' (adobe compatible data file) by clicking the change file type button under the file menu in the acrobat dialog box. the old file can be converted to a new file by clicking the 'convert' button. the keygen has a function to convert a pdf file to a new file by clicking the 'convert' button. a new file (e., asc/acd) is created by clicking the 'convert' button. the new file type is changed when the file extension is changed. we would like to see a new file type called 'asc' or 'acd', since we prefer to adopt new file types in order to facilitate interoperability between the file formats. however, the new file types do not yet exist. the new file types are not currently used. the old file is converted to a new file, not the new file to an old file. the conversion of a file is not yet stored in a database of the software. in addition, the conversion of the file to another format is not stored for the next version. the surface models can be stored in a self-organized database. for this purpose, we use a database management system (dbms) (e.g., mysql, oracle, ms-access, etc.) to store and manage the data. dbms is a software for converting data into a format suitable for a computer. the format of the data can be complicated, simple, or semi-complex. for our purpose, we need a dbms that can execute queries for searching and sorting data. for the initial version of the database, we designed a dbms of a simple structure, since we do not need to handle very large data. acrobat and adobe pdf files are stored in the database. the data, including a database schema, the file of the database, the database file, the database image, and the database shell, can be uploaded and exported from the database. the database is a simple relational database. structure of the database schema is described on the homepage of the database (). a schematic picture is presented on the homepage of the database. user-defined functions are also included in the database. users can define their own functions. users need to upload the functions and the database schema

to the database. database schema and function images are available for reference on the homepage of the database (fig. 11). the pdf file and acrobat can be handled in the database by updating the file location of the database (fig. 12). the database is designed to be capable of handling the following operations: loading the database, adding a new file, deleting an old file, updating the file location, and exporting the database (fig. 13).

If users want to fully verify the full data models, they have to use the 3D scanner, which is not an easy task for a family physician to accomplish. If people do not want to depend on the 3D scanner, they can still do surface model verification by using Adobe Acrobat 9 Pro, which is widely used by family physicians. In the verification process, the user can see the deviations between the reduced data and the full data directly. The full data models can be saved as a new MCS file with the reduced data and the label file (Fig. 5). The mesh model has to be reconstructed. For this project, the sectioned images were keyed for the 3D reconstruction. The DICOM files (first-generation) contain a large number of images. Their number typically ranges from 5 to 25 (1, 2). Due to multiple scanning at different levels and scanning parameters, a number of scans is needed for diagnostic utility. Like other digital contents, DICOM data can be converted to PDF. However, these data are often full of a mix of smaller and larger gaps within the file data (1, 2). For example, DICOM data are frequently either inadequate or inflated, depending on the scanner and its settings (1, 2).

Furthermore, DICOM data are not fixed within themselves, and they may be altered by manual changes in DICOM transfer (1, 2). Consequently, surface models are often overlapped and distorted. The PDF file has a large number of Page objects, and the DICOM data are overlapped with each other, thus overprinting the Page object. Consequently, the format of the DICOM data is blocked out and the outlines are lost.

In contrast, PDF file format is free of these problems. The PDF file format is a hierarchical file format, and it can be created precisely from any data source (2).
