designing for creativity & the mind covid-19 has caused a lot of uncertainty. this uncertainty is not only in the physical world but also in the mental world. with everyone glued to their screens, designers are finding themselves doing more and more sketching and designing with their minds alone. the future of workplace design & certification workplace practice is the future of interior design. smithgroup is working with our community of practitioners to elevate the profession. we are launching a certification program that will make us eligible to be awarded the adi designation. we are also partnering with the adi to create new content and resources that will aid our community. hear from wanda jackson, director, smithgroup. the workplace is back in session as summer came to an end and i prepared my son to head back to school, my thoughts drifted back to a time when my work was focused on designing schools. no matter if the project was for a higher education or grade school client, even decades ago we spoke of the need to create environments that would better serve learners of all types and styles. hear from alexis kim, principal and workplace practice strategist, smithgroup time as the new variable in workplace design programming over the pandemic i, like many, dove deep into gardening and garden design. one of the fascinating things i discovered is that landscape architects design two plans: one for the initial planting installation and a second for the ultimate design, at the 5-year mark when the plants have grown to their mature form. they also do four studies to consider how their design morphs over the seasons to ensure there is year-round visual interest. their process reflects the inherent understanding of the dynamic nature of the craft. hear from melissa hanley, co-founder, principal, and ceo of blitz. 5ec8ef588b
