i think that the alternative is to leave the work to the wto. and the united states is increasingly, and i think rightly, concerned about the consequences of the reduction of global trade, particularly the large increases in trade in services and the reduction of trade in goods, and particularly the loss of the most efficient places to do business. the idea that you could set up a new trade regime on the basis of a bilateral or regional agreement to address these problems is one that many of my friends and colleagues strongly disagree with. and i think its the right thing for the united states to be doing and its the right thing for the united states to be doing. i think theres not a really great case that it would be in the interest of the united states or the united kingdom to sign up to any kind of new international regime. its just not going to be in our interests. we are becoming more conscious of it, the united states and britain, and the opportunities for us in terms of our own trade and our own ability to have influence over the rest of the world. and that is not going to change. i think theres a lot of things that the united states and the united kingdom can do in the existing international regime to make themselves more comfortable, but that wouldnt change the fact that we are getting more comfortable with the fact that we are becoming less important and less powerful and less influential in the world. to try and backtrack a little bit, as you can imagine, since the pandemic started, its been a pretty intense time for many of us, but ive been very blessed. i was in cambodia, then i went to myanmar, then i went to mongolia, and then i went to india to see my dad. then i came back to the u.s. and thats when i started to really hit my own family with the virus. its been a long, long time and ive had some time to reflect on all of this. and my dad is doing well now. he has a new heart, and hes feeling great. he has two amazing doctors that have worked with him and a team of dedicated nurses. its been a long, long journey for him and hes a warrior. i think that we can all learn from his strength and resilience.

china is playing a more and more sophisticated game, on a variety of issues including this one. and it really is true, there is a curve here. this changes, you know, in terms of how much it changes things, and how uncomfortable it is to deal with a problem that was vexing a year ago. but it certainly changes the game. it makes it harder, and it makes it more complicated, and it makes it more difficult to resolve the difficulties that we face today. and we sort of have a unique circumstance, where, it isnt like are among friends, and we have or china is not negotiating directly with the u.s. and we are negotiating with an administration that is in disarray, that isnt

addressing us very well, and that is in a political situation, that is vulnerable in terms of whether or not it has a lot of credibility. so, we do have to be somewhat cautious here. that was an issue in katowice and ultimately the issue that led to the collapse of the talks, was not so much the impasse on pledges as it was on on how you can actually put a price on these emissions reductions

and the source of that price and in terms of money that you'd have to involve countries would have to come to terms with how they are going to deal with that issue, which was ultimately not resolved. I think the long term arc of trade and the health of the market will be a vital component of climate change, and that's the kind of the major negative feedback loop, if you like, that will be in play. if you start to add into the mix on the domestic front, things like slower growth, trade wars, uncertainty, all of those things that are going to make life hard for businesses. slow growth will mean, in the medium term, we are not going to be able to do as much of what needs to be done as quickly as we would need to do to keep global temperature rise within a 1.5 degrees
