Tixati is pretty far from dead. They just released a version about 2 weeks ago with decentralized sharing channels, which are a great way to share things that can't be taken down in light of the megadownload and Kim Dotcom fiasco, and according to their forum a new version may be out within the next week. I'd call that pretty alive. That is not the situation that is occurring here. uTorrent produce torrent software, which some use for downloading copyrighted materials (such as an album) and some use for downloading other kinds of materials (such as LibreOffice or Linux Mint). uTorrent, for their various sins, are not pirates. That is not what they do. It is also not clear that people are willing to pay them what they are asking, especially with better alternatives available. The main goal of both uTorrent and FileZilla are to be reliable, efficient, and easy to use BitTorrent clients. Not uTorrent. One of the most frustrating aspects of the client is its inability to handle large files when using the Internet Connection Sharing (ICS) protocol. In fact, it blocks the shares from being used altogether. If you are new to p2p file sharing, then uTorrent will not make the experience any easier. Make sure you get past the barren Start Screen, and join the deep end of the pool. Most BitTorrent clients, such as uTorrent and Vuze, host a DHT system that utilizes BitTorrent's implementation of the Kademlia peer discovery protocol. The decentralization of the network allows you to share files rapidly, and the Kademlia's DHT allows you to find peers fast. It also gives you control over who you share files with, and the DHT relies on the assumption that if you don't know the IP address of someone, they aren't a good partner for you. 5ec8ef588b
