The benefits of wetlands are so significant to Florida that the state funded many grants and joint projects with the federal government. According to the Environmental Protection Agency, the water in wetlands is clearer than that in bodies of fresh water. Because of the presence of wetlands, many farms, ranches, sand dunes, and cities have been able to thrive. Florida has been able to turn back the hands of time and reclaim its wild landscape. If you are looking to find the source of water in your home, you are most likely in the right place. Here in the U.S., coastal wetlands are of crucial importance to the economies of Florida. The Florida Ecological Association estimates that mangroves and tidal marshes are worth $14 billion to the state of Florida. Nearly half of the nutrient that flows into the Gulf of Mexico originates in the coastal estuaries and mangroves. "...those areas in the fill used for land support in the area of 100 acres or more that are located in a water body or that are in a water-holding capacity. Use and configuration of these areas shall be in keeping with their designation as wetlands." Brent is a clinical professor of law at Columbia University, and has been dean of the law school since 2008. He loves to read and travel, and enjoys riding motorcycles. He and his wife, Christine, have three children, including twin boys, Joey and Lou. Sonny and his wife, Courtney, have two little girls. Sonny grew up in a small town in Minnesota and attended the University of Wisconsin. He graduated from law school in 1996 and has been practicing in Wisconsin and in Boone County, Missouri, ever since.

Brian Barnard has specialized in higher education law for more than twenty years. His experience includes law at the highest levels of college and university governance (faculty, administration and senior leadership), law that focuses on the relationship between higher education and government and the impact that research and teaching have on students, jobs, communities, and funding. This background is foundational to his most recent venture as a private mediator, mediator trainer and teacher. He is enthusiastic about the role of mediation in the adversarial context of the legal system. Brian lives in Charleston with his wife Janice, four children, two dogs, and two horses. This course will explore the natural history of wetlands, biophysical and botanical theories and their links to the history of wetlands, common land tenure and preservation, and the role of wetlands in the evolution and distribution of life on Earth. There are wetlands everywhere in nature and they play a pivotal role in the global cycle of natural resources such as carbon, phosphorus, nitrogen, organic matter, and water. Wetlands create a biodiversity hotspot, create water filtration, and sequester carbon. Wetlands are important habitat for birds, fish, reptiles and mammals and have tremendous economic value. In this course we will examine how the social and cultural surroundings of a wetland may affect human interactions within it and this will be explored within various geographic settings, such as the UK and the United States. We will discuss wetland-based communities and processes that have grown up within them. Finally, we will examine how wetland resources might be managed in order to achieve maximal provision of these services and benefits. The course will include consideration of the environment, society, economy, and culture within the context of the wetlands themselves. 5ec8ef588b
