We try to create and maintain a bundle that is the smallest possible bundle to get your AAR deployed on a device without any further configuration. But, if you need it, it is possible to extend DexProtector with your own security, integrity and tamper resistance functions. Similar to the previous point: it is possible to extend DexProtector with your own security, integrity and tamper resistance functions. If you do, it is a good idea to make the mechanism highly secured, for example by using the keystore or debug certificate. Otherwise someone can get your device ID, or be able to intercept traffic on the server and decompile your application. In the Studio, you can select the modules you want to protect, specify the section where you want them to be placed (e.g. Modules), set the encryption settings, and choose the output APK/AAB/AAR-file (with the settings in the following two attributes Sign APK and SignAAB). If you use Sign APK and SignAAB attributes of the element with the useAAR flag, then only output is an Android Library (AAB). Protection of files in the assets folder is done by the androidManifest file, and in the res folder by the strings, string-arrays, string-entities, string-arrays and string-entities. The content of resources (including values/ files) is not protected. The settings for obfuscation of names of resources in code of Android applications. If you want to protect a module from server attacks and static analysis, such as decompilation, you can use the name obfuscation. If an application is protected and the name of resources in its code is encrypted (e.g. the name includes the word "private"), the server can't find them, and the application can't be decompiled. Thus it is safer to obfuscate name of resources in the code.
