When I talk to my students about the importance of building their aural memory, there are always two things that I can always count on hearing that they have heard many times before. First, my students either say that they always forget the songs. Second, it's always kind of a funny story of when they were seven or eight years old. Every time I hear that a student said that they always forget the songs, I wonder how many times have they been in class and then forgotten the song. When it comes to the second response, I think that my students are probably being honest. There have been too many times that they've remembered the song only to later forget it for the rest of the year. Why do they forget? It's not that they're lazy. It's not that they're not paying attention. It's not that they're too distracted by something else. It's because they're trying so hard to remember and there is just no way they can. When it comes to my students who say that they always forget the songs, I also wonder how many of those students are at a high school. For some reason, high school students seem to have a much better memory than elementary and middle school students. My students start learning music at age three. Throughout elementary and middle school, they learn their scales, remember their songs, and they never forget. But, just like my students, most people have forgotten songs that they once knew. Or they can recall what they learned by rote from their grade school days. Most of us have a good friend who can tell us almost every song that they know. Most of us have a song that we can sing right now. But that memory is still in our subconscious, and we rely on our aural memory to jog our brain and get that song back. To help some of my students who have forgotten their songs, I've been giving them flash cards. On the card, I have a note and I've asked them to write the name of the song on the card. It's like we're trying to scan a room full of songs into our brains, like trying to read the names of a bunch of people that you've never met. While my students and I are not sure if flash cards are good or if flash cards are a waste of time, it's hard to argue that having a song in your brain is not better than not having it in your brain. Even though they say that they remember the song, they probably forget most of the times that they sing it during the school year. They try so hard to remember. That's all we can do. By the end of the school year, we'll never be able to remember all the songs that we knew last year. 5ec8ef588b
