it should be obvious that matchpoint: tennis championships is strictly for sim players, since it isn't really a game in the true sense of the word. unlike a tennis game or a simulation, matchpoint doesn't actually have you create any sort of character to inhabit. you are simply a tennis player moving back and forth on a field in chronological order, with a static on-screen dot chart that lets you see when you hit winners, fail to hit winners, and so on. if you want a game that gives you the opportunity to create a career or a character, matchpoint: tennis championship with a slightly more generous list of features might be what you want. the presentation of the game at e3 2019 was certainly polished with the game looking great, but the game does have the feel of an older, rougher model of the game. control was sub-par and the game can be hard to focus on, especially when the opponent is slow with shots (often the case on easy and intermediate levels). the game also comes to you on a singular disc and requires a disc drive for use, although being xbox one and not xbox play anywhere means you can carry the game from one console to another. this isn't a deal-breaker for a tennis simulation, but we like to have some extra options and flexibility when it comes to playing our games. the game does offer variety in the presentation however, with the ability to fully customize players like sybille bammer, see what outfits they wore, and even see more of the animated cutscenes of their matches in the youtube menu. you can also browse their career or save a game and compare it with others too.
