Monday, September 18, 2012 Bing Science is the definitive resource for all things related to science, providing comprehensive, relevant, and accessible information for a wide range of audiences. To serve this purpose, Bing Science uses a unique, state-of-the-art approach to search. "We're constantly innovating in search and in what we can do with Bing." said Shilpa Maheshwari, Senior Vice President of Search. "With this latest milestone, we are just beginning to explore the new frontiers of our search engine. We invite our users to join us in this exciting and ever-evolving journey." The Bing Science search engine is powered by a combination of machine learning and human information scientists. It's built on Bing's advanced search technology and natural language understanding, enabling it to understand what people mean when they say "I'm feeling cold" or "I'm hungry" in a matter of seconds. This can then be combined with an extensive set of data from Bing's database of over 200 billion Web pages, to help users find what they're looking for. Bing Science has been well received, winning several top search and business search awards, such as: The Bing Science search engine, powered by Bing's advanced natural language understanding, has been available on the Web since September 12th, 2012. Today, the Bing Science search engine is available in English as part of the Bing search experience and can be enabled with the click of a mouse. Today's launch represents the latest step in an ongoing journey to bring the power of Microsoft's search engine to billions of people around the world. This is a technical milestone for the Bing team, but it's also a significant moment for our customers. For years, they've enjoyed the quality of Bing's search results and, with the availability of Bing Science, they'll now be able to access research-driven, authoritative information online in a more personalized and relevant way. One of the key benefits of Bing Science is that it is free to use. The Bing
