This invention relates to ultrasonic diagnostic scanners, and in particular to such scanners having means for automatically adjusting the gain of the system in response to changes in patient size. A typical ultrasonic diagnostic scanner is composed of a transducer system, a system for controlling the transducer system, and a system for controlling the entire scanner. The transducer system has one or more ultrasonic transducers which are mounted in a hand-held case. The transducer system is a combination of components, such as the transducer, coupling gel, transmitter power source, cables and connectors, housing, and display system. The system for controlling the transducer system provides signals which control the transducer so that the signal will impinge upon a particular location in a body under examination and cause reflection of the energy back to a receive/display system and processor. The system for controlling the entire scanner includes means for controlling and monitoring the operation of the hand-held case and its components. These means include a processor for controlling and processing the signals output by the transducer system, a display system for displaying diagnostic data, and a keyboard for entering data. In a typical ultrasonic diagnostic scanner, the patient is placed in a static position and the transducer system is placed adjacent to a body region of interest. The transducer system transmits a pulse of energy into the body region, and the reflected signals are processed by the processor to produce a video display which is "stored" in a memory. In a typical ultrasonic diagnostic scanner, a plurality of such video displays are obtained for viewing by the operator. Each video display corresponds to a particular body region which is interrogated. Typically, the transducer system includes a pair of linear array transducers which are moved across the body region in a plane perpendicular to the direction of the transmitted pulse. The signals received by the transducers are processed by the transducer system to produce a video display of the body region under examination. The display may be
