Speaking to the raking-up of investigative journalism by the FBI, a group of digital-privacy advocates have called on Congress to introduce an amendment to the post-Snowden USA Freedom Act legislation which would have the force of law and make a blanket ban on forced backdoors in encryption a significant part of that law. Privacy International, Access, Big Brother Watch, Center for Democracy and Technology, Electronic Frontier Foundation, Access, Firstlook.org and other advocacy groups have written to Congress, urging that the law should ban any process by which legal access to encrypted data could be forced from within. "In an immediate post-Snowden environment, the fact that technologically advanced law enforcement and intelligence agencies were spied on by the US government at the behest of US law enforcement and intelligence agencies was deeply disquieting for many people in the US and abroad. "While the law passed by Congress in 2016 is clearly a step forward in the right direction, it does not go far enough in its protection of privacy and we are disappointed at the lack of progress on backdoors and weak encryption as a result of the failure of the USA FREEDOM Act to pass. "As a next step, we ask you to enact an amendment to this law to ban forced backdoors and weaken encryption for law enforcement, as proposed by the OPEN Act which we urge you to pass." The letter says that the rule of law in the US should be 'built into' encryption systems which end-users would be under no obligation to implement: "Only such legally implementable encryption will stop criminals from breaking in." Keyword 'acceptable' exemptions "We fully acknowledge that there are legitimate exceptions which allow law enforcement and intelligence agencies to access communications without endangering security, and that these must be 'carved out' in 04aeff104c
