Happy Graying your hair! The results are mostly potent. I am just getting the look that I want without having to use harmful chemicals or spend money on a professional colorist. Maybe you can, too. If so, take a look at this turnaround. While the layer-based editing tools in Elements 19 are similar to the ones most users are used to in Photoshop, it's still a baby step. The weather forecast module uses Adobe's new "Geolocator" technology, similar to such features as Apple's and Google's. This ability to learn from your smartphone's location history provides useful insights that could also be incorporated into Elements. With Photoshop Elements adding some of the major elements of its namesake, I was expecting them to work more or less the same as the main Photoshop application. The new template layout, though, doesn't match the dark look of the main Photoshop application, even when you substitute your own images. Elements also doesn't seem to have any ways to interact with the Artboards and Call-outs that Photoshop usually offers. - I don't see that you can drag the artboards in and out of the giant layered workspace by themselves. You are limited to placing reference images or video clips into the custom backgrounds--however, I like having an additional tool such as this, and especially how it helps to visualize your edits and see your results. As for the Call-outs, they're still usable, but they're not as robust as the ones in Photoshop. For example, Photoshop typically offers colours to use in filling in transparent areas by default, whereas Elements doesn't have that feature unless you get Adobe's Transparency Enhancer extension.
