U.S. District Judge Amy Berman Jackson agreed to an October 17 request from both men to travel to the Russian city after each of them pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges. The judge granted the travel exception, but it is not clear how long they will be allowed to travel for. Jackson wrote in her order that she was granting the requests subject to conditions, including that the men travel in designated vehicles with government-operated GPS equipment, and agree to have one-way travel arrangements for them. "Neither defendant may request leave, either individually or jointly, to reside outside of the country," the judge wrote. The judge also barred the two men, who are longtime business associates of President Donald Trump, from traveling to Russia or Ukraine. Jackson said they are barred from participating in "any fundraising events, political, public speaking or other social events that might benefit or advance a political agenda" in the two countries. Manafort, who went with Gates from the firm he led — the firm that did much of Trump's campaign's media consulting work — to the Trump campaign, is currently free on bail. However, Jackson told Manafort he couldn't travel outside of the U.S. for any reason from March 6-16 as part of a release order that also required him to wear an ankle monitor.
