Photoshop Express offers easy-to-use editing tools (but no special touches like granular resolution or other things from full-blown Photoshop) that lets you edit a photo. It's more flexible and much easier to use than Lightroom, and you can save the final image or even resize and save at the original size. It also gets out of your way when you're ready to start work. Photoshop is the first photo editing software I've used that works as smoothly as a Mac OS X app. It just feels like a native Mac app. If you want to get creative, Photoshop has no shortage of tools for you: The fierce Pixelbender brush create all kinds of surreal art. The Boolean painting tools allow you to create and combine shapes. You can do almost all kinds of filters in Photoshop. You can even resize images using a bucket of ink. If you want to avoid Photoshop in the future, perhaps, don't use advanced features.

The stability is great, I never had one crash, never had to panic about saving the images and never had to worry what files are to open. I used large JPEG's from a Nikon D3s and the images never suffered from it (the ones with over 2000 pixels all the way to 6400 pixels). On top of that, Photoshop is more Mac-like than Windows, especially when it comes to the mouse.

I have used PS for many years now and I can't imagine having used anything else until now. Why would I want to even think of using anything else?

Hello Mac Store... Isn't that what the OS X updates are for?

I love my PS.
