This invention relates to a cosmetic case and more particularly to a dressing case which is adapted to fit within a larger case such as a suitcase or the like and which may be partially or totally closed or hingedly and removably opened for dressing purposes. It is well known that in making purchases at a beauty parlor, for example, the consumer will sometimes be required to purchase a number of cosmetic and personal hygiene items which are carried on the person of the individual. These items must then be carried to the consumer's automobile, where the items are placed in a particular location in the automobile for use by the consumer. It is noted that some items, such as deodorants, are toxic and some may not be appropriate for young children. Under such conditions, it is quite difficult for the consumer to have the necessary items in a single location and which are easily accessible without the need for opening or removing a greater amount of items from the outer case. Further, if a particular item, such as an item which is to be used in a procedure, such as a deodorant which may be used at the same time as a hair rinse or shampoo, can not be placed within the outer case, there may be occasions where the consumer is unable to carry out the procedure at the exact time of purchase since the items may not be available. There have been a number of attempts made in the prior art to provide a suitable cosmetic case or case for carrying cosmetic products on the person of an individual. One of the major problems with any such case relates to the display of the product to the consumer and the ease with which the product may be used at the time of purchase. For example, many cosmetics are provided in the form of a small container which is substantially opaque or in which the consumer is unable to observe the product prior to purchase. Further, if the product is not readily removable from the container, there may be the likelihood of the consumer causing damage to the product by tapping a product, shoving it, spilling it, etc. Further, many of these prior art cases are constructed of plastic and they often have mechanical parts which are susceptible to damage. Many of the prior art cases are also designed to be used as a cosmetic case but which does not have a resealable flap or may be opened for dressing purposes. In such prior art cases, the items to be carried in the case are often loose within the case. It is noted that many of the goods or products carried by the consumer are often provided in tubes,
