On the practical level this refers to children around the world being killed or maimed in wars the countries are fighting. But this is also an ethical problem for the international community. It is morally wrong to kill innocents in these wars. It is murder. You can't kill innocents to promote peace. If the American army were to attack Iraq, this would be an entirely different kind of war. It would not be a war fought for conquest. It would not be a war that we would be fighting for our national interest. It would not be a war that we would be defending ourselves against aggression. It would be an entirely different kind of war. And it would be a war to which we are morally accountable. Although the American people are strongly supportive of our foreign policy and military posture in the world, they do not believe us to be morally accountable for the wars we fight. This is a problem. Because the degree of moral responsibility we have for the wars we fight is extremely high. And the reason for this is that the ability to invade a country and destroy its army has been taken off the table. It is an international consensus that if you are invaded and your army is destroyed, you should surrender. The consensus even extends to the actions of a nation as powerful as the US. We will not use military force to invade a nation. That is no longer an option. Now the definition of a war to which we are morally accountable is not fixed. For centuries people have been fighting wars and there has never been a definition of what a war is. At the end of the first World War the British, the French and the US governments all gave different definitions of what a war was. And they were all different. The most common definition is that a war is a conflict between rival nations. This is not an accurate definition. It does not work. There has never been any rival or enemy nation from which the US has been excluded. We have been attacked and bombed by nations from across the whole world. The second definition is that a war is one in which a nation is invaded and its army is destroyed. This excludes invasions by nation states against non-nation states (like Iraq). It also excludes invasions by
