He is one of a small group of American sociologists, including Erving Goffman, Louis Dumont, and Henri Lefebvre, who have done critical and creative work in applying this theoretical approach to a variety of areas. This new volume (edited by Mills, Evans, and Roberts) collects a wide range of writings by Mills and co-authors. The contributors include three major works by Mills: Symbolic Interaction, An Approach to Social Psychology (1953); Social Being, Material Becoming (1955); and Human Interaction and Communication (1965). Among the invited contributors are C. Wright Mills, Erving Goffman, George Herbert Mead, Herbert Blumer, Kenneth Clark, and, in a short piece, Frantz Fanon. Additionally, an important feature of this volume is the introduction of a series of seven essays dedicated to a major area of research, the "meaning" of social action. The dominant theme in these essays is the idea that social action need not have "meaning" to be effective. Mills is worth reading for the complex, lucid, and central role he has played in teaching and popularizing the ways of symbolic interactionism. Mills's major achievement was to provide a guide for sociologists who were in search of new ways to do sociology (rather than just new methods for the study of society). Drawing on deep philosophical and psychological insights, Mills began by examining the symbols and narratives of everyday life and the common-sense meanings and explanations that people give to social behavior and meanings. When we understand people as being driven by underlying motives and purposes, we are doing symbolic interactionism. Mills was influenced by the work of Herbert Blumer, who wrote that what you think is what you do. Thus, understanding an action not just in terms of its external appearance but in terms of its causes, motives
