Current issues in analysis of measured electrical impedance tomography (EIT) signals for evaluation of cerebral oxygenation. Measurement of blood oxygenation using near-infrared spectroscopy (NIRS) has developed into an important clinical tool with utility in many medical specialities. However, the technique lacks portability and accuracy, and cannot be used easily in the operating theatre. Electrical impedance tomography (EIT) has been proposed as a potential alternative, but preclinical studies suggest that the technique will have technical problems. Preliminary clinical work is encouraging, but further research is needed to develop a commercial system. Early work suggests that the technique is able to detect changes in cerebral oxygenation in response to changing blood flow. If these findings are further developed, it is likely that the technique will have a significant role in clinical practice.
